For the last 30+ years of my life, I can hear a quick tsk and feel her groping me on the back quickly to remind me to sit down and not hunch over because it's inappropriate. These days, whenever I shoot portrait sessions, many times I'll sit my client or on a bench, or somewhere on the ground and I'll be heard saying (minus the tap on my back). Don't squirm. Slouching is unsaid, my mother is right, but especially in the photos. When people sit down, they tend to sit, holding their knees and stomach closer to the camera, their necks are back and it highlights features that you (and they) don't want to highlight. As photographers, it's our job to make our customers look good, so knowing how to properly place them in seating positions is a good tool in our arsenal. Of course, the model looks pretty great and model-ish in both of the above poses, but how many of you have clients who have perfect size 0 bodies, pronounced jaws and pretty pink poop without the help of Photoshop? Yes, that's what I meant. In the next video clip from Photo Week on CreativeLive, Lindsay Adler gives some great tips and demonstrates how to pose for people while sitting so they look flattering, and they're not slouching. Lindsay shows how to create triangles that allow for shape and negative space (without any touches on the back and the reappraisal of frotskyist!). The person sitting upright not only looks smart and confident, but the eye is drawn to the face. Just as no suit will flatter everyone, so no pose will suit everyone. Since women really differ so much, you need as many tools as possible in the photographic toolkit to praise the different aspects of each individual. In this posturing video tutorial, I will share guidelines related to photographing all women, whether boudoir, wedding sessions, or high school seniors. These concepts are universal, and mastering them will make you a better photographer. 5 Guidelines for Posing Women Emphasize Assets, Reduce Weaknesses' Bandage and Curve Asymmetry and Interest Levels Avoid Straight, Even Legs Use Narrowing Points Another Subject is Covered.
